

URBAN JOURNALISM WORKSHOP 201(APPLICATION

Since 1986, Washington Association of Black Journalists has introduced young people to careers in the media through an intensive skills-building workshop held each spring. The Urban Journalism Workshop, a free journalism-immersion program for high school students, is seeking applicants for its 201(training program. The workshop, conducted over eight weekends, is open to all high school students.

STUDENTS: Read more about the workshop and see examples from previous classes at www.ujwonline.org.

VOLUNTEERS: Sign up to assist and mentor local high school students each Saturday, 9:30 a.m.-4 p.m., Mar.1 through April 26 at American University and NPR.

STUDENT EXPECTATIONS

This is a rigorous program requiring your full participation. Professional journalists and journalism educators will be watching your growth and development throughout the workshop. In order to get the best from this experience, you will be expected to:

- 1) Attend all eight sessions on time. If you expect to be late, you are required to inform your section leader in a timely fashion. You will be dropped from the program for unexcused absences.
- 2) Come prepared. You must be informed, so read the newspaper, listen to the radio, watch television news broadcasts and consume other forms of news. You will be tested weekly on your knowledge and asked to discuss news events during each session.
- 3) Complete assignments on time. Journalists must meet deadlines. As an aspiring journalist, you will be expected to complete all assignments in the time given. We can give you the best feedback on your work when we have your work on time.

If you can fully commit to these expectations,
you should excel in our program.
You will also learn a lot and hopefully have fun, too.
Thanks for applying!

THE URBAN JOURNALISM WORKSHOP (UJW), is co-sponsored by the Washington Association of Black Journalists (WABJ) and The Washington Post Young Journalists Development Program (YJDP). Professional journalists in print and electronic media teach the students the basics of real-time journalism during eight consecutive Saturdays from early March through late April.

Students accepted into the UJW are given core-skills training in reporting and writing and allowed to focus their learning time on one of three news mediums: newspaper/online, radio news or television news.

The students produce Web stories, a newspaper, a 30-minute radio news show and a 30-minute television news show.

ELIGIBILITY: All interested high school students in Washington, D.C.-area schools are encouraged to apply.

WHEN: Eight consecutive Saturdays, beginning Mar. 1 to April 26, 2014. The workshop begins at 9:30 a.m. and ends at 4 p.m. each Saturday in Washington, D.C.

CONTACT: UJW Program Coordinator, Dakarai I. Aarons, (901) 491-7511 wabj.ujw@gmail.com; YJDP Coordinator Jaye Linnen 202-334-4917, yjdp@washpost.com.
